

Community Health Workers (CHW) are trained public health workers who have a close understanding of the community they serve. They build a trusting relationship that enables them to be a link between health/social services and the community to facilitate access to these services. The community has a need and there are services available. By becoming a CHW, you can help bridge that gap.

- Financial assistance
- 12-week, self-paced course
- Apprenticeship at a health care facility
- Potential employment
- in the country as a CHW

- Provide links to community resources such as free/low-cost medications
- Assist with applying for enrollment in health insurance
- Help with setting and achieving wellness goals
- Provide accurate information about chronic diseases and COVID-19, how to cope with it and other public health emergencies
- Gain support from other organizations serving the community

- Improve adherence to health recommendations
- Provide health care education and training
- Reduce the need for emergency and specialty services

troy.edu/communityhealth